It also has a character set table, which allows you to see which charset is used for a file. This tool is very useful for checking system files, however some of the programs may hijack some of the settings made with it. Evaluation and conclusion Some of the options might have been changed but the options itself is very useful for me. I am going to play with it more and see what happens. What's New in the DllChecker?

We think you're going to love it! The most comfortable way to check DLLs and EXEs is to use the GUI developed from scratch in Perl and saved as a standalone program executable (PE, DM) with a friendly and intuitive interface. In the current version of DllChecker you have the following options available: - Check all files in a directory and a sub-directory, recursively, using an INI configuration file for each file; - Generate plain text or HTML reports according to a pre-defined text file; - Search for DLL and EXE file version; - Generate a report with product name, file version and CPU type, as well as any other data you choose to collect. Fully functional web tool From version 1.0 DllChecker has a fully functional web interface for the users who want to perform their own analysis and processing. The tool is not limited to the task of checking binary files, but it can do just that if you want. You can browse and view reports and logs in the web interface and further edit, sort and select the results. The input for analysis of a DLL and EXE file is done via the special text format provided in the tool. The.ini file can be saved to a text file (see File -> Save and Load settings) and can contain information about the DLLs and EXEs you want to check. DllChecker uses a special XML/XSL format that can be viewed on the web interface. DllChecker can also convert XML and XSL files into HTML reports. It's also worth mentioning that this version of the web interface was added as a completely free educational edition on the DllChecker website. Mobile apps Another option is to use the free Android and iOS apps that provide the same functionality as the web interface without the need to manually open the tool each time you want to check DLLs and EXEs. Using the apps you can easily check files on the go - either on your phone, or while you're away from your PC. You can now access the full functionality from your Android or iOS device via the web interface. DllChecker Support: The full documentation and support is available from the website. The next version will include the following: -.NET support; - Advanced UNICODE features; - Enhanced search; - Process monitoring; - More options available for the users.
