cn shankar rao sociology text free downloadTemporal changes in the neutrophil-L-selectin molecule-mediated binding to L-selectin ligands present on activated endothelial cells during the endotoxemia-induced neutropenia. Exposure of human neutrophils to the endotoxins lipopolysaccharide (LPS) or peptidoglycan (PGN) causes a rapid reversible reduction in the number of neutrophils available for respiratory burst and a complete inhibition of the L-selectin molecule-mediated neutrophil adhesion to L-selectin ligands present on activated endothelial cells. Binding of activated neutrophils to L-selectin ligands is an initial step in the transmigration process and thus a potential therapeutical target. We investigated the possible role of the L-selectin molecule in this process. The time course of the neutrophil-L-selectin molecule-mediated interaction of neutrophils with activated endothelial cells during endotoxemia was assessed by means of in vivo neutropenia and by flow cytometry. After a bolus administration of LPS to healthy volunteers, neutropenia, the L-selectin molecule-mediated binding to activated endothelial cells and endotoxemia-related end-organ dysfunction were studied in sequential analysis. After 5 min of LPS-induced neutropenia the neutrophil-L-selectin molecule-mediated binding of neutrophils to activated endothelial cells was severely reduced. This correlated with a short but marked delay in the clinical symptoms of endotoxemia. During the subsequent recovery period, the neutrophil-L-selectin molecule-mediated binding of neutrophils to activated endothelial cells returned rapidly to normal levels. Exposure of neutrophils to LPS or PGN leads to immediate and reversible neutropenia. In vivo neutropenia is coincident with and followed by a dramatic drop in the number of viable neutrophils available for L-selectin-dependent adhesion. L-selectin plays a central role in the interaction of neutrophils with activated endothelial cells during endotoxemia.
