Beginner Introduction to MIG (metal inert gas) welding. This induction will get you familiar with the welding process, from safety and machine setup to your first weld. Duration: 8minInstructions: Voice-over and Animations MIG welding is an interesting process because you do not need to touch the welding rod to apply the arc. This is very different from stick welding where you are hammering the anvil and welding rod against the joint. MIG welding is done by a machine known as the MIG welding machine. You can weld metal all around, making a solid weld. The machine that makes the electric arc is called the weld gun. MIG welding has many advantages, such as less spatter, greater metal penetration and the ability to rapidly grind out welds. The most common types of MIG welding are Manual MIG (MM) and Automatic MIG (AM). There are different types of welds you can make. These include: fillet, overlap, butt, sticking and TIG welding. If you are doing MIG welding in a shop, the welding rod can be pre-cut into a certain size, known as the weld wire. The size of the wire is called the wire diameter. A new welder has a hard time using the pre-cut wire since it has a taper in it and doesn't look like the weld wire you are used to. For this reason, welder training is a very important thing to learn, especially if you are new to the process. MIG welding is mainly made of carbon steel and stainless steel. The welding wire is made of electrode material. The welding wire is the specific material to perform the actual welding process. It has a small amount of filler material, called flux. The actual welding wire is designed to protect the weld from the molten metal. MIG welding is good for structural shipbuilding. It can be used in the following types of welds: Procedures Step 1: Safety Set up your machine to its lowest setting. Check the spool, the nuts and bolts, and the gas pipe for leaks or damage. The proper welding machine and the correct gas flow for your weld are extremely important. When you use a gas shielded MIG welding machine, you have a grounding electrode (G.E.) and welding wire. When used together, they will create the electric arc needed to make a weld. Step 2: Machine Setup

Explore visually stunning environments and solve elaborate puzzles to venture into the deepest level of the legendary underground world. Create your own adventure with multiple endings Fantastic epic soundtrack, composed by 2D-ORGs And this is the game: A: So my friend did some very quick research on this and it seems that it's a DOS game. The code is backwards compatible with the Nintendo 3DS and PlayStation Vita, so a Virtual Boy cartridge with a loader like 3DBlack might work, but that has its limitations. Here is a link to a link to a video of it in action. It seems to be a unique experience, because it's a 3D platformer with a pretty simple story.

A: The visuals were created by Kenji Kaino, designer of the incredible Kain, Kazuma Kaneko's debut in the Street Fighter series. References The Making of 'Agartha' Agartha Kenji Kaino's works Mark McCrystal Mark Andrew McCrystal is an American football coach, currently the defensive coordinator at the University of Arizona.
