The first one that came to mind was the 'Unreasonably difficult Japanese puzzle platformer game, QUB3D' by No Starch Press) that I played back in grad school and was very impressed by. I have spent a good portion of my life creating conceptual puzzles, and while I haven't found a formula to replicate them, I have learned a lot from them. The people who own the rights to an intellectual property also have several things that they can do to protect it, and that of course includes creating puzzles which are impossible. When I first started creating puzzles, I made them all legal. Almost. When I realized that it was impossible to make a puzzle legal while keeping it playable and fun, I decided to stop. Despite the fact that there are many ways to judge a work of art, conceptual puzzles are decidedly subjective. The point is that in a puzzle game, you are presenting a work of art to your players. Is it art? Well, we'll get into that. I'm not really a puzzle person at all. In a well crafted puzzle game, you are not playing a game. When you begin to play a puzzle, you're already immersed, in a sense. You're immersed in the story and the art and the music. You don't notice the puzzles. They become the world. If I try to play a puzzle I made, instead of say, Tetris, then I generally can't solve it because I know my own game too well. In Tetris you're always pressing the same keys, you're always putting lines together. I don't want to repeat those actions. I want my player to solve the puzzle. If a puzzle is too easy, then how good is a good puzzle? Puzzles are just like art. You never forget a good puzzle. When I play a game like Brütal Legend and the puzzles are decent, I remember them the rest of the day. I try to design puzzles where people don't have to use a lot of common sense to figure out how to solve them. In Tetris, for instance, I don't want a puzzle in which you have to line up 2 rows, press the "L" key and then line up an extra row. It would be too easy. You could probably "solve" it in less than a minute. By all
