I'm wondering when should one use problems and when should one use solutions? Should you use problem solving as a way to learn? What's the difference between a solution and a problem? Also, is it best to learn/search for problems first and then proceed to solving? I'm curious what kind of difference there is to searching for solutions then searching for problems then solving them. A: The term problem, as you've stated, comes from a different field of mathematics and is generally used to mean a question one must answer. (As you can see, some people do not agree with this; see here for a clarification). The term solution is generally used to mean finding or finding a right answer for a problem, or at least a worked answer. There is nothing wrong with using solution to mean answer, but I prefer problem to problem solution. The term solution comes from astronomy where the solution is the place where planet goes, answer comes from the term answerable. This can mean if it's an answerable question. :) EDIT: You've asked two questions in one, and using the term problem in the first makes the second most sense. I'll try to address both at once. Should you use problem solving as a way to learn? Both. You are basically asking why you can't do both. I think it is a great way to learn. It's like doing an exercise and have someone else tell you what to do. Each new exercise will add knowledge to your brain, and you will actually end up learning by doing. When you do practice problems, you are also probably learning at the same time. Q: Update Identity Users with many to many relation SQ
