Ozzy Osbourne sued by former business manager over $11M Another setback in a long-running battle between Ozzy Osbourne and his former manager, Rob Abel, was reported Wednesday by multiple sources. According to TMZ, the rocker has sued Abel for $11 million in damages, claiming the manager stole from him after the business manager filed for bankruptcy protection in May. Lawyers for the British icon filed a notice of claim under New Jersey's Fair Debt Collection Practices Act with a New York County Court, court records show. Abel has denied all claims and countersued Osbourne on July 3. The case has significant ramifications for the future of the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. As reported earlier this month, the nominating committee for the 2014 class had presented a slate of five rock and metal acts, including Osbourne, to the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, and the group was working to finalize the names of the inductees before they are announced on Aug. 30. "We took it as a pass, and it was just a matter of time," said Mark Beyer, the chairman of the nominating committee, who spoke to Billboard. Beyer said that Osbourne had made the cut in their previous presentation, and that all three members of the committee — including David Marzer, the head of AOL Music — are excited to induct the music icon. "I will never say anything negative about Mr. Ozzy Osbourne," Beyer told Billboard. "He is a great guy. He is one of the people that I hold in the highest esteem in the music business." Beyer also said that no matter what, Osbourne will be a Hall of Famer. "To be selected to that group of people, it's an honor to be in that group," he said. "I would be honored to stand at that podium with people like Peter Gabriel and all those other
