Editors are the people that make sure everything looks fantastic on every page of the website. They colorise text, fix tiny formatting issues and make sure fonts are consistent and sizes are correct. They also optimize images, making sure they use the right resolution and do a variety of very nice things with image adjustments that they will never mention in a sentence in front of me. If I ever have a query, they try to help me as best they can. If I am ever down in a project, they can help in a more tactical way. An image editor is a different breed. They are also very much creatures of habit. But as much as there is coding, there is also a large emphasis on drawing. A branch that goes through every single image and adds in layers . A very large amount of autocomplete. A search that knows every option and every step that has to be taken. There is an odd thing about a digital editor. Before you can edit anything you need to first draw it. The way to draw is not by adding in layers, or working on a canvas, or working on a specific image. Drawing is a separate process that is often done offline with a pencil or pen on paper.
