It's my sincere hope that more editors will get the chance to work with Photoshop, and introduce its unique strengths to content consumers. I know I can't do this without the help of many experts and indie developers. Now, I use Microsoft software on a Mac, so it's always interesting to see how the software runs on the other platform. My last Mac-centric article was for PC World a while back when Apple released Final Cut Pro X. I don't have any of the new Apple hardware and, in fact, my current MacBook is barely up to snuff with many of the new Mac Pros and Apple TVs. So when industry leaders make big announcements, I look for the biggest hardware and software buzz in their keynote speeches and sign-up for their press events. So it is today that I have a new Mac to play with ... the new Apple iPad Pro. That's right, Apple's new full-fledged tablet. It's a beautiful machine, with a big, bright display, and first-class components. It's also a hefty piece of hardware—11.5" inches by 7.5" inches by 0.8" ounces (a water weight of 8.68 ounces)—weighs about as much as the iPhone 8 Plus. But it's not a laptop. And I don't want it to be. I'm still using a laptop, and I like it. Still, I feel that the iPad Pro is a perfect tablet-mobile macOS device. And that's what I'd like to demonstrate: how to be silly on an iPad, instead of writing product reviews. The iPad Pro manages to be both fun and professional. It's true that I can reach for my iPhone and write using the Apple Pencil, make annotations, or grab to-do lists from Notes, but I'm not thrilled with the compromises that have been made on the Mac for these apps. Sure, Penultimate Notepad is nice, but how many shortcuts are there for a notepad that supports Undo and Redo? On a tablet, I'm looking for a full-fledged notebook, and I love that Apple has delivered just that—with the iPad Pro.
